If Chris Van Allsburg is the fish that got away, then I'm the angler that couldn't tell the difference between a perch and a pike. In the late 1970s, when I was art director of The New York Times OpEd page, Chris's wife, Lisa, brought the newly minted portfolio of her husband to my office hoping that I would assign him an illustration. The work was amazing, but it was not illustration.

The Polar Express - Wikipedia

As an artist, Chris Van Allsburg has a breathtaking command of perspective and light. His black and white drawings have exquisite detail, yet they are somehow generic. In his generics, though, he's hearkening back to the childhood of the adults reading this story to their own children: there's Walter's hat, a picture on the wall of a baseball not a basketball player; and who names their kid Walter these days, anyway?
