Self Deception - YouTube

Self-deception Although honesty is central to the self-concept (Blasi, 1984; Aquino and Reed, 2002), people routinely attempt to deceive others: in one diary study, participants reported lying once or twice a day (DePaulo et al., 1996). While some of these are “white” lies to protect others’ feelings, many are self-serving.

The slow decay and quick revival of self-deception

Self-deception occurs when we convince ourselves that something is true when it isn’t, but we do it unconsciously. The difference between lying and self-deception is that, with lies, the person is aware that he is not telling the truth. While with self-deception, people unconsciously convince themselves that a lie is actually the truth.
